- limiting the ability of security to deal with violent situations puts them in harm's way, needing to be rescued by someone with a gun, should they still be alive.
- I am a member of a hated minority too. Republicans always face violence and discrimination on campus, and have interruptions to planned events.
- Recently at Portland State a planned event was interrupted and closed down by a group with a cow bell. Security didn't do anything to help close down the people who were disrupting the event. I do not believe security is hyper-reactive nor is it prone to violence.

- The security guards save many lives. Accidents will always happen, and as much as possible need to be avoided through training, but the good that security does by bringing violence to an end, some times by violent means, is good, with local police forces and security on sites like campuses.

- I urge that the supposed statistic of "52% of students" be checked. It seems highly unlikely that good data collection was done.
