3 4 5 6 7 8	De Ch Cit	the Matter of: Validation Proceeding to termine the Legality of City of Portland arter Chapter 3, Article 3 and Portland y Code Chapter 2.10 Regulating mpaign Finance and Disclosure.Civil No. 19CV06544DECLARATION OF JEFFERSON SMITH
9 10 11		Jefferson Smith, declare:
12	1.	I served 2 terms in the Oregon House of Representatives during the years
13 14		2009-2012, winning election in 2008 and 2010. It was a deep honor to serve, and to serve with so many wonderful people.
15	۷.	I ran for Mayor of Portland in 2012, finishing second in both the primary
16		and general elections. It was an honor to receive support from many
17		Portlanders.
18	3.	While I was serving in the Oregon Legislature, I had a conversation with a
19		lobbyist about whether more off-reservation casinos should be authorized. I
20		explained my view: I stood for the Kitzhaber position, which was that each
21		tribe could have one casino on its reservation and no more. The lobbyist
22		responded to the effect: "Good. Because I want to give you $2,000. And if
23		you turned around and voted for off-reservation casinos, I'd get fired!"
24	4.	The following thought occurred to me: If I deposit that check into the
25		campaign account, did I just make a binding contract? I did not deposit the
26		check.

5. During my service in the Oregon Legislature, a lobbyist representing billboard owners asked for my vote to allow the erection of digital billboards along Oregon highways. I voted "no" on the bill in committee. Some months later, the same lobbyist, who represented many other clients as well, invited me to drinks. He told me that he was directing all his clients not to donate to my campaign, because I had voted against him on digital billboards as well as one other issue two years prior to that. 6. These two incidents illustrate what too often appears to be the quid pro quo nature of political campaign contributions in Oregon--particularly with organizations whose financial interests are impacted directly by votes of the Legislature. Those who offer the contributions often expect something concrete in return, such as a vote on a particular bill or a position on a particular issue. The candidate often understands that expectation and knows that the contributions will cease, if the expectation is not met. The campaign contribution is the only financial transaction I'm aware of after which both parties insist nothing has changed. That is, of course, absurd. 7. During my years at the Oregon Legislature, every member of the majority Caucus was expected to pay "dues" to the Caucus campaign committee in the form of money from the Representative's campaign account. Oregon law allows unlimited transfers of funds to any political committee. Those who expected leadership positions within the Caucus or Committee Chair positions in the Legislature were expected to contribute at higher levels.

8. At the time of my service in the Oregon House of Representatives, the "dues" expected from each member was a minimum of $25,000. Members serving in majority Caucus leadership, as I was honored to do, were expected to pay "dues" of over $60,000. The highest ranking members of leadership were expected to contribute well over $100,000. As campaign costs have escalated, these "dues" have increased.

- 9. After the first campaign, friends and family get tapped out. Members must then rely more and more on corporate lobbyists for the necessary funds. As members of the Legislature gain seniority and ascend the ladder of Caucus leadership, they build closer relationships with lobbyists and their clients. The impression this builds is that members progressively favor the views of those who support their seniority.
- 10. In my first session of the Legislature, a more conservative colleague advised me to call the leaders of the corporate lobby and make clear, "If you don't give me large contributions, you won't have my voice in the caucus meetings." This was not in the context of helping me in a contested race for election (I had already won) but in the context of helping me build influence within the Caucus. After all, I had to raise a lot of money to pay the Caucus "dues."

11. The largest campaign contributors were referred to as "partners" by 1 2 legislative leadership. The views of "partners" were made very clear at 3 Caucus policy discussions. 4 12. Campaign contributions are sometimes given to candidates that the 5 contributor actually opposed for election. These are called "make up 6 money." These are campaign contributions typically from a corporate 7 lobbyist who had just supported the recently defeated opponent of the new 8 recipient of the campaign contribution. 9 13. A typical case: In a contested race, a very common scenario is that the 10 corporate lobbyists will donate to the Republican, their top preference. 11 Then, if the Democrat wins, the same corporate lobbyists will give new 12 campaign contributions to the victorious Democrat. Obviously, the second 13 round of contributions are not expressions of support for the Democrat in 14 the election. They are means to curry favor with candidates who have 15 already been elected. 16 14. I have talked to many constituents who believed that large political 17 contributions purchased results in the Legislature. There was a frequent 18 perception among voters of soft bribery in the political process. 19 15. Fundraising is not evil; nor is making donations. I believe in fundraising; I 20 have raised millions of dollars for campaigns and causes I believe in. I believe the campaign contribution and the nonprofit contribution are generous and benevolent ways of participating in community and democracy. I remain grateful for every contribution I've ever received. That very gratitude can build relationships and engender a deep-seated sense of reciprocity. And it is also clear that the larger the contribution, the larger the potential expectation.

16. People are operating within the rules. They are doing what they can and even must within those rules to win elections and build influence. If we want to reduce the element of exchange and the impression of buying and selling influence, we need to change the rules.
I hereby declare that the above statement is true to the best of my knowledge and belief, and that I understand it is made for use as evidence in
