BACKGROUND:

Oregon's Independent Living Services are provided by Centers for Independent Living (CILs) across the state. According to the Department of Human Services, CILs are private, non-profit organizations run by people with disabilities in which services are provided through a peer-mentoring model. CILs provide services to individuals with any type of disability and of any age. Individuals that experience a significant disability that limits their ability to function independently can access skills training; peer counseling; life transition assistance; help with housing, transportation, cooking, and advocacy services, among a range of other supports and services. Over a dozen counties in Oregon are currently without CIL services.

House Bill 3122 seeks sustained long-term funding until July 2029 to ensure program stability for independent living centers.
