BACKGROUND:

According to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), people in the juvenile and criminal justice system reveal high rates of mental and substance use disorders and personal histories of trauma. A review of many public institutions and service systems that are intended to provide services and supports to individuals has found they are often themselves trauma-inducing. Additionally, it has become evident that addressing trauma requires a multi-pronged, multi-agency public health approach inclusive of public education and awareness, prevention and early identification, and effective trauma-specific assessments and responses. In public institutions and service systems, there is increasing recognition that many of the individuals have extensive histories of trauma that, left unaddressed, can get in the way of achieving well-being. As a result, there is an increasing focus on the impact of trauma and how service systems may help to alleviate trauma-related issues by conducting their duties under a trauma-informed approach.

HB 2575 establishes a program to provide grants to local agencies for trauma-informed training and to develop model training program that takes into account effects of trauma and to develop best practices for future trainings under the Department of Public Safety Standards and Training.
