

Requiring state approval of curriculum and other items that differ from public school standards could be used as a way to control what is allowed to be taught at all schools, not just public schools. There are probably good intentions behind most of the provisions, but it sets in place a method to possibly discriminate based on religious ideology in school curriculum.