BACKGROUND:

The nonprofit work-study pilot program established by House Bill 2802 resembles the Federal Work-Study (FWS) program in terms of requirements for jobs to serve the public interest, provide academic relevance, and pay minimum wage. The FWS program provides part-time employment to undergraduate, graduate, and professional students with financial need, and can include both on-campus jobs and off-campus jobs. According to the Office of Federal Student Aid, off-campus jobs with public agencies and private nonprofits must be in the public interest, and all work-study jobs must be academically relevant to the maximum extent possible. Students enrolled in work-study are required to earn at least federal minimum wage, but hours worked and wages earned cannot exceed the total amount of financial aid awarded. Federal funds may cover up to 75% of work-study wages, except in certain circumstances.

House Bill 2802 establishes a pilot program to employ students at nonprofit organizations in return for an hourly wage and a 20 percent tuition reduction.
