BACKGROUND:

A developmental disability child foster home is a small residential care facility that provides care for four to seven children with intellectual and developmental disabilities (IDD). The children in care are generally under age 18 but may be up to age 22 in some cases. The operator of a home is unrelated to the children in care, and parents or guardians do not reside in the home and do not attend to the children. However, a parent or guardian's role is to advocate for a child's needs as a member of the individual support plan team, alongside the child, service provider representatives, and a case manager from the community developmental disabilities program. Current law prohibits a child who is residing in a developmental disability child foster home from being attended by a parent or guardian.

House Bill 3256 allows a parent or guardian to attend to a child in a developmental disability child foster home with approval from DHS and directs DHS to develop standards for granting approvals by administrative rule.
