BACKGROUND:

Under Oregon law, all water belongs to the public and use requires authorization from the Oregon Department of Water Resources (OWRD), which provides permits that limit water use by place of use, point of diversion, and type of use. Because water in Oregon remains appurtenant to the land on which it is used, if a water right holder wishes to alter their use in any way, they must file a transfer application with OWRD. Opportunities are provided for other water right holders and the public to protest the issuance or transfer of a permit. Water users can assert that a new permit may injure or interfere with their water use, and the public can claim that issuing a new permit may be detrimental to the public interest.

House Bill 3346 would establish a Task Force on the Water Rights and Transfers backlog to report on the cause and extent of, and solution to, this backlog, and appropriate General Fund moneys to the Oregon Water Resources Department, Department of Justice, Office of Administrative Hearings, and Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife for increased capacity to process the backlog.
