BACKGROUND:

Memorial Day traces its origins to 1868, when it was originally known as Decoration Day, intended to honor the Union soldiers who lost their lives during the Civil War. Prior to being observed nationally, there were several such recognition days held locally. The National Cemetery Association traces the origin to Columbus, Georgia, where the Ladies Memorial Association was formed to clean up the city's cemetery and, in the words of a letter published in the local newspaper, "to wreath the graves of our martyred dead with flowers." By 1890 the occurrence was held in every state, eventually leading Congress to declare the last Monday in May as Memorial Day.

Veterans Day also originated as a date of recognition with a different name. On November 11, 1919, President Woodrow Wilson commemorated the one-year anniversary of the end of hostilities in what would later be known as World War I. The day was known as Armistice Day until the end of World War II, when General Dwight Eisenhower picked up on the idea of a fellow veteran to dedicate the day to veterans of all wars, and later signed the bill as President in 1954.
