BACKGROUND:

The Center for Health Statistics within the Oregon Health Authority retains certain personal records and vital statistics for Oregon's population in order to provide accurate data and reporting on patterns in births, deaths, marriages, divorces, and other affairs. Records of live birth, commonly called birth certificates, are created and reported to the Center by county governments when infants are born or become known. Birth records generally include a child's parentage to the extent it is known. In adoption cases, a court will issue a report to the Center to be attached to the child's birth record, which allows the Center to amend the birth record to reflect the adoption. When this happens, the original birth record is sealed and may only be opened by court order or by request of an agency operating a voluntary adoption registry (ORS 432.245 to 432.250). Adoptees 21 and older may apply to the Center to receive an original, unaltered copy of their birth record along with information regarding their birth parents' contact preferences. If the person's parentage was unknown at the time their birth record was created, that will be reflected in the original birth record. However, recent advancements in biological testing of a person's DNA (deoxyribonucleic acid) to establish ancestry has enabled adoptees to learn more about their parentage than was known at the time their birth records were created.

Senate Bill 573 A allows a person to request to add their biological parent's name to their birth record when parentage is determined by DNA testing or other means and to request a noncertified copy of the record.
