BACKGROUND:

Oregon's antitrust law, sometimes referred to as Oregon's "little Sherman Act," is patterned after its federal counterpart and explicitly provides that federal court opinions shall be persuasive in interpreting Oregon's law. Both laws prohibit the unreasonable restraint of trade; the federal statute can only reach cases that involve interstate commerce, while Oregon's law applies to activities that occur within the state, or between Oregon and another state.

Federal cases have ordered disgorgement – handing over the earnings that flow from the unlawful act – as an equitable remedy for antitrust violations. Federal Sherman Act violations may result in a civil penalty of up to $100 million from a corporation or $1 million from an individual, and a prison sentence of up to 10 years. Oregon last increased the civil penalty amount in 1999, raising it from $100,000 to $250,000. The crime is currently classified as a Class A misdemeanor in Oregon, punishable by imprisonment for up to 364 days. The Oregon Attorney General (AG) is currently barred from criminally prosecuting an antitrust violation if a civil trial has already commenced for the same act, or from prosecuting a civil action if a criminal trial has already commenced.

Senate Bill 310 increases civil and criminal penalties for a violation of Oregon's antitrust law, permits the Attorney General to pursue both civil and criminal actions for a violation, and explicitly includes disgorgement of monetary gains as an equitable remedy.
