I completely oppose this bill! I've been a dental assistant for over twenty + years and was able to earn my certifications through study and testing. The testing assures that the individual understands the concept of what they are doing. I feel that it is extremely important to be certified and properly trained. School does not cover every thing an assistant needs to know but it helps them have basic knowledge so the employer can give the finishing touch. Why should offices be a training center when there has been time and money placed in colleges for this type of education. I don't really want a non certified person performing radiographs or other functions in my mouth. People rely on the office to have the best for the job, not just any individual.
