Animals should not be exploited for human entertainment in traveling acts because they have inherent value and should be treated with respect and compassion.

Animals used in traveling acts, such as circuses or zoos, are often kept in small, cramped cages or enclosures, denied proper exercise and socialization, and forced to perform unnatural behaviors through the use of cruel training techniques. This not only causes physical harm and emotional distress to the animals, but also goes against their natural instincts and behaviors.

Animals have the right to live free from human exploitation, and their use for entertainment purposes is a violation of their fundamental rights. Animals used in traveling acts are often subjected to physical abuse, neglect, and harsh living conditions, which can cause them to suffer greatly. This exploitation also sends a harmful message to society that animals are mere objects to be used for human entertainment, rather than living beings with their own inherent worth.

Furthermore, traveling acts often involve the transportation of animals over long distances, which can cause additional stress, injury, and even death. This not only puts the animals at risk, but also contributes to environmental issues such as air and noise pollution.

In summary, the exploitation of animals in traveling acts is morally wrong and goes against their fundamental rights to live free from human exploitation. It is important for society to recognize the inherent value of animals and work towards ending these harmful practices.
