On behalf of We All Rise, and my work in community centered planning and resilience have solidified my belief in the importance and necessity of the development of an interconnected system of resilience hubs throughout Oregon. While resilience is at the forefront of planning across the United States, Oregon would be one of the first states to implement this type of transformative policy and initiative. The creation of Community Resilience Hubs has the opportunity to not only address and mitigate the pervasive damages of disaster events but also to create spaces for communities to come together and build together - that in itself is a worthy cause.
