The Bill of Rights clearly states the RIGHT of the people to BEAR ARMS shall not be INFRINGED. There are no special clauses for "undetectable", nothing about serial numbers, nothing about defining "unfinished" or prohibiting such, this whole bill is unconstitutional!

a friend said very eloquently:

Just like the Constitution protects the broad concept of "speech" instead of particular modes of speech, it protects "arms" as a general concept of weaponry. The idea was not to protect a specific type of weapon, like a musket, any more than the idea of the First Amendment was to protect a specific mode of speech, like a quill pen or printing press. That is in large part because the Framers of our Constitution and the people who ratified it knew that while technology and circumstances would undoubtedly change in unanticipated ways, these broader concepts of self-defense and free speech would remain vital to a free society.
