BACKGROUND:

Wildlife in Oregon is a public resource that is managed by the state for the benefit of its populace. State laws recognize the significant value of wildlife, while also requiring management and regulation that balances diverse values, interests, and impacts. While damage compensation programs exist for certain other species in Oregon, currently, no such program exists for damage caused by elk. During the fall of 2023, the House Interim Committee on Agriculture, Land Use, Natural Resources, and Water convened a workgroup on this issue co-chaired by Representative Helm and Representative Bobby Levy.
