

SB 1579 -3, -4 STAFF MEASURE SUMMARY

Senate Committee On Human Services

Prepared By: Iva Sokolovska, LPRO Analyst

Sub-Referral To: Joint Committee On Ways and Means

Meeting Dates: 2/7

WHAT THE MEASURE DOES:

The measure creates a special fund for advocacy centers that support children who have been abused. It directs the Oregon Legislature to provide enough funds to make sure that all the centers helping these children are fully funded. This money will also support teams that work to stop child abuse in each county. The Department of Human Services will get money from the general fund to run a one-time grant program, giving more help to these centers. A task force will be set up to check if Oregon is following Karly's Law, to figure out the best way to fund the centers, and to find out why some kids can't get help and report to the Legislature.

BACKGROUND:

Children's advocacy centers are safe, child-friendly places where kids who have experienced abuse or trauma can go for help and support. These centers bring together professionals like counselors, doctors, and police officers to work together in one location. They provide services like counseling, medical exams, and legal help, all in a comforting and supportive environment. The goal of children's advocacy centers is to make sure that children who have been hurt or abused get the help they need while minimizing further trauma and helping them on their path to healing. Regional children's advocacy centers are similar to regular children's advocacy centers but serve a broader area or region, rather than just one local community. They provide specialized services and support to children who have experienced abuse or trauma across multiple counties or jurisdictions within a particular region. Regional centers often collaborate with local agencies, such as law enforcement, medical professionals, and social services, to ensure that children receive comprehensive care and support. By serving a larger geographic area, regional children's advocacy centers can reach more children in need and provide a coordinated response to child abuse cases. There are 24 currently active centers which serve all 36 Oregon counties, and four more centers are developing. In these centers, 7,895 children per year are seen for concerns of all forms of abuse. Overall, funding for children's advocacy centers in Oregon is typically a combination of public and private sources, with each center employing various strategies to sustain its operations and meet the needs of the children and families it serves. Children's advocacy centers in Oregon typically receive funding from various sources: grants (state and federal), private donations, philanthropic organizations, insurance reimbursements, state and local government contracts, and volunteer support.
