I find this utterly unreasonable. Oregon has experienced a surplus in tax revenue for the past two years, and eliminating property tax limits seems unnecessary. This move not only lacks justification but also has the potential to displace those teetering on the edge of financial stability from their homes, exacerbating the already critical issue of homelessness. If the state genuinely aims to address the homeless problem, one would expect them to foresee that implementing such measures is counterproductive. I vehemently oppose this proposal on behalf of all homeowners struggling to make ends meet.
