Until the state proves that is capable of addressing the needs and providing for its citizens with the surplus of tax money that is languishing in what at best could be deemed slush funds, I see no reason to allow the state the ability to supersede the will of local elections and their officials to determine property tax. We are citizens of the highest-taxed populations in the country and have little to show for it in ways of quality of life. We should be taking away the influence of the state legislature until they have proven themselves to be worthy of this responsibility, not increasing the stature of a government that is buckling under its weight of indecision.
