BACKGROUND:

Interstate licensing compact establish formal, legal relationships between states that improve the portability of occupational licenses by lowering barriers for multi-state practice. Compacts establish uniform guidelines, standards, and procedures for regulatory agencies in compact member states. They are often overseen by interstate commissions, with member states typically appointing one or more delegates to the commission. According to The Council of State Governments (CSG), there are 15 health professions with available licensure compacts. Forty-nine states, including Oregon, have enacted at least one licensure compact.
