BACKGROUND:

A recorded instrument affecting real property is a legal document that has been officially filed with the county recorder's office to establish, transfer, or restrict property rights. These documents become part of the public record and are enforceable under real estate law. Some types of recorded instruments affecting real property are deeds (documents transferring ownership of real estate), easements (agreements granting someone the right to use part of a property for a specific purpose), and restrictive covenants (private land-use restrictions written into a deed or subdivision agreement). Governing documents are rules created by homeowner associations (HOAs) or similar entities that set regulations for properties in a community. House Bill 2001 (HB 2001), passed in 2019, aimed at increasing housing supply by ending exclusive single-family zoning in many parts of Oregon. The law was one of the first in the U.S. to require cities to allow "middle housing" in areas previously limited to single-family homes. For example, cities with more than 10,000 residents have to allow at least duplexes in areas zoned for single-family housing, while cities with more than 25,000 residents (and all cities within the Portland Metro area) have to allow triplexes, fourplexes, townhouses, and cottage clusters in areas zoned for single-family housing. The bill also required local governments to change zoning codes to accommodate middle housing options. Cities were also prohibited from adopting regulations that make middle housing development more difficult than single-family homes.
