BACKGROUND:

Every year, some students who have enrolled in a higher education program leave college or university without receiving a degree, certificate, or other credential. The National Student Clearinghouse Research Center produces a periodic report on this population, known as "some college, no credential" (SCNC). According to the Higher Education Coordinating Commission's 2023 Annual Performance Progress Report, the percentage of Oregon adults ages 25 to 34 with some college but no credential was 18.4 percent in 2021 and remained relatively steady from 2017 to 2021.

Some states and institutions have made efforts to reach and reenroll these students, either statewide or institution by institution. On December 11, 2024, the Senate Interim Committee on Education heard a presentation from ReUp, a company that contracts with colleges, universities, and states to conduct outreach to adults with SCNC and reconnects them to degree and training programs. ReUp operates programs in states including Alabama, Colorado, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, New Jersey, Ohio, and Washington. Certain program features, including funding for student reengagement, student coaching and support, and target populations, vary by state as outlined in ReUp's presentation.
