BACKGROUND:

A squatter is someone who occupies a property unit without permission or legal right with the potential to gain legal rights through adverse possession. In Oregon, squatters may acquire legal ownership of a property through adverse possession if they meet specific criteria over a continuous period of 10 years (ORS 105.620). Adverse possession allows squatters to claim ownership of a property they don't legally own. This concept is based on the idea that if a property owner neglects their rights, a squatter can step in and take possession. The requirements for adverse possession, a legal right, include open, notorious, continuous, and hostile use of the property. Hostile possession means occupying the property without the owner's permission and with an honest belief of having the right to do so. Actual possession refers to physically using the property as an owner would, such as maintaining or making improvements. Open and notorious possession means that the occupation must be obvious to others, not concealed, signaling to the public and the owner that the property is being used. Exclusive possession refers to the squatter being the sole occupant, not sharing possession with others, including the legal owner. Continuous possession refers to the squatter maintaining uninterrupted possession for the entire 10-year period without significant absence. Oregon does not require squatters to pay property taxes or possess a "color of title" (unofficial ownership of a property, usually without certain required documents like an official deed) to make an adverse possession claim; they can gain color of title through the process of making a successful claim for adverse possession. The only requirement before the claim is filed is the 10-year continuous occupation. Property owners facing unauthorized occupants must follow legal eviction procedures, which involve serving proper notice and potentially filing an unlawful detainer lawsuit.
