As a sibling of an adult with special needs, I whole heartedly support removing the percentage cap on education funding for students with special needs.

K-12 years are some the most critical time for students, but especially for those with special needs. The behavioral, social, and life skills public special education can provide is extremely important for their future development, and capping this access to education is wrong. We owe it to these students to support them heavily during this critical time of learning to give them the best chance at transitioning into adulthood.
