This makes sense for many reasons: the CEI hub would likely be inaccessible in a disaster and would prevent emergency responders from accessing fuel; this would identify population areas that would be cut off in the event of a large earthquake; this will also consider community safety and environmental justice which is now so endangered since the large proportion of Oregon's fuel storage is in one place in NW Portland; and this also requires consideration of our declining reliance on fossil fuel as Oregon strives to achieve its climate goals by relying more on renewable resources.
