Access to information is the bedrock of a healthy, diverse, robust, and thoughtful society. Removing access to information based upon personal beliefs, or purely subjective analysis of material imbued with individual bias, is in one word: unethical. It is the individual's choice what information they consume, and is our duty as a free, democratic nation to provide access to this information in a public, and equitable fashion such as our library systems. It is not our government's place to censor, place personal judgement/value on, or remove articles of publication from the public's purview. That, indeed, is the making of an oppressed, unhealthy, and unilaterally controlled society. Those of us who have benefited from consuming historical books and published information happen to know exactly how this type of oppression begins and ends. If you don't, I reckon it's time you got to the library for some independent research.
