It's so important in this time of high prices for food that the poor among us can still find places like the food bank to supply their needs. I worked in food service at a school for 20 years and those programs for the free and reduced meals for families who could not afford the price of food was so important to their learning . We even had to take advantage of reduced meals while my husband was out of work, and you don't forget times like that, but that was temporary, so I can only imagine what that may be like if it was a permanent condition. Put yourself in that place if it was your child or your grandchild, and what's more important than feeding those in need?
Sincerely, Joan Imhoff
