

Submitter: Austin Sayer

On Behalf Of:

Committee: House Committee On Judiciary

Measure, Appointment or Topic: HB3829

I have done some pretty dumb stuff while driving. I have even caused an accident involving another vehicle because I was not fully focused on my driving. Thankfully nobody was seriously injured or killed. Recently there was a wreck in front of my house where someone was killed by another driver. I can't speak to the mindset or condition of the driver who caused the wreck, but they claimed it was because of a distraction inside their vehicle. How many times previously did this person drive distracted? How many chances should someone get for this? A person was killed in one incident and no injuries in another. Should I get a clean record while the other person doesn't? How many near misses does it take before these incidents are left on the driver's record? I don't believe someone should get a clean record if they make poor decisions when driving. We are driving a lethal weapon down the road and we should handle this responsibility as such at all times. The person killed in front of my house was driving responsibly and they don't get a second chance. Why should someone who kills them or potentially could have killed them get a clean record?