I breed standard poodles for show for myself and the ones I don't keep I sell as pets on a strict spay neuter contract. In the contract that I have people sign they pledge to give the dog back to me if for any reason they cannot keep the dog. I breed maybe two or three litters a year. My dogs are fully health tested and health guaranteed. You actually really cannot buy a better standard poodle. I mostly only sell my dogs to retired people who want a full-time companion. Are you really going to spend taxpayer dollars to monitor people like me? I'm one of the good guys. There must be another way to monitor puppy mills and/or those rescues who take in third world country dogs and sell them to anybody also the American humane is out there importing dogs from third world countries and smuggling them in through rescues and selling them they're basically the pet stores of the modern era. It's well known and has been much written about by the national animal alliance association.. Let's not penalize the people that breed really great dogs in this country and do it the right way. I don't think we should be spending taxpayer dollars on a new bunch of state workers and rules and regulations. Don't we have homeless people to worry about and mentally ill people to worry about. I think your attention should be in those areas. It's not directed towards people like me that spend three times more money that I ever make from selling puppies because I do everything the right way.
