Measure 114, Oregon's latest gun law, is a misguided attempt to reduce gun violence. By requiring a permit to purchase firearms, imposing a 30-day waiting period, and banning magazines holding more than 10 rounds, this law infringes upon the constitutional rights of law-abiding citizens.

This measure will not effectively address gun violence, as criminals will continue to find ways to obtain firearms illegally. Instead, it will disproportionately affect rural residents, hunters, and those who rely on firearms for self-defense

Furthermore, the permit requirement and magazine capacity limits are arbitrary and lack a clear connection to reducing gun violence. The law's implementation will also place undue burdens on local law enforcement and firearms dealers.

In conclusion, Measure 114 is an overly restrictive and ineffective measure that infringes upon Second Amendment rights without addressing the root causes of gun violence.
