Most states are banning RCV, rather than adopting it, as lawmakers find that RCV makes elections more difficult and less trustworthy.

State and local officials also realize that RCV is connected with the push to centralize—and nationalize—control over our elections and eliminate the electoral college.

RCV makes it harder to vote and harder to administer elections. Ballots are longer and more complicated, leading to longer lines, more mistakes, and more spoiled ballots. The RCV tabulation process is more complicated and less transparent, threatening voter confidence.
