Programs providing food through food kitchens, backpack programs, etc. for the the growing number of children, families, seniors, and struggling individuals has been a daunting challenge for too many years in this country. Now, more than ever, these safety net programs are feeling the chokehold due to the further deprivation of badly needed governmental assistance. Even volunteers are looking to start a work shift with a better outlook of what will be available that day for the good folks who happen to find themselves in a time and circumstance of need. It is food. It is for hungry people in need. It is in America, which increasingly appears to be only a pretender to its claim as a great country.
