Not long ago, I recall going to a local school, only a few miles away, on election day to happily stand in line to vote. I would provide my driver's license to an attendant who would check my name against a list of registered voters, hand me my ballot, I would vote onsite and drop my ballot into a locked box watched over by at least two custodians. Ballots would be counted after 5pm and winners announced that evening.

While mail-in voting has definitely offered a convenient way to vote, it in no way can be considered more safe and secure.
