The benefits of mail in voting are numerous and obvious. Mail in voting aids those people with physical handicaps in partaking in the voting process, it ensures that workers need not miss work and pay they desperately need, it provides a thoughtful, low-pressure environment for better contemplation, and ensures that voters will not be rushed or cut off from voting as we saw on certain university campuses last year.

Mail in voting is a benefit for rural people, busy people, thoughtful people, and overwhelmed people. In short, everyone. There really is no downside. It's a strong system with a good history and should continue to be the law of the land.
