Oregonians have been voting by mail for multiple decades. This allows people who find it hard to travel, who have medical conditions that prevent them from standing in long lines, or other issues that affect their ability to vote in person to vote. Having a mail in ballot allows us to research what we need as we go through it. If you take away our ability to vote by mail you will see a drastic decrease in voter turnout.

This last election it was illustrated by television hosts that some people in other states who vote in person, didn't even know the right date to vote. With a mail in ballot, that doesn't happen. We receive our ballots with plenty of time to respond. It's not a single day event.

I am very much against returning to in person voting. Especially as this would happen only to cater to a narcissist idiot who bought himself a presidency.

How about instead of trying to fix something that is not broken you put new laws in place that prevent felons from running in a presidential election. That would actually be useful. Or maybe insist that all government positions have actual job qualifications/requirements that have to be met to prove you can actually do the job. That is how the rest of the world works.

That would be useful. Taking away our mail in ballots would Not be useful.
