SB210

For over 65 years I resided in the Midwest United States (Illinois and Iowa). My only option for voting was to vote in person. This was a very cumbersome process, and I am sure had limitations for many, many citizens.

Now, living in Oregon, I have been introduced to the opportunity to use mail-in voting. To me this is by far a much better choice. It is secure to almost the same degree as voting in person. I also think it's much more convenient, especially for those people that live in rural or remote areas. I am only guessing, but I can imagine that the percentage of voters that are able to participate in elections as much higher with mail-in voting.

Does it not seem to be a logical decision to have a method for as many people being able to vote as possible?
