SB210

I raised my children around our family table, where we regularly discussed current issues and filled out our ballots together. I've always appreciated the saying: "Being taught to avoid talking about politics and religion has led to a lack of understanding of both. What we should have learned is how to have a civil conversation about difficult topics." With that in mind, I am deeply grateful for the opportunity to create time and space to sit down with my family, teach them how to engage in meaningful discussions, and emphasize the importance of voting as an essential American civic duty. Although we don't always vote the same, we have thoughtful and valuable conversations about issues like SB210. I strongly oppose any efforts to make voting more difficult. I'm proud of my state's voter turnout and value the convenience of mail-in voting, which spares us from standing in long lines and navigating unnecessary bureaucracy—allowing me to spend that time with my family instead.
