Mandating in-person voting poses significant challenges for vulnerable populations, particularly seniors and individuals with disabilities, potentially disenfranchising them from the democratic process. This group includes veterans who have made considerable sacrifices to protect our voting rights and freedoms. The proposed shift to exclusively in-person voting may inadvertently favor those with greater mobility and resources, while disadvantaging citizens who face physical, logistical, or safety concerns when accessing polling locations. Such a policy change could be perceived as an attempt to consolidate political influence among certain demographic groups, potentially compromising the principles of equal representation and accessibility in our electoral system.
