Requiring in-person voting penalizes those who can least afford it. This requires people to take time off of work, to find care for children or elderly, to drive or find transportation to a local polling place. For the more rural areas of the state, these polling places may be a significant ways away. With the current system, it allows residents to have time to read and research and evaluate ballot measures and candidates. It allows people to vote when they have time and where they live. This will significantly negatively impact a large percentage of the state and would impact voter turnout.
