Voting in person often incurs higher costs due to the resources required to set up and manage polling stations. This includes expenses for renting venues, hiring and training poll workers, and providing voting equipment and security. Additionally, there are costs associated with ensuring accessibility for all voters, such as ramps and other accommodations. These logistical and operational needs make in-person voting more expensive compared to mail-in voting, which centralizes the process and reduces the need for multiple physical locations. It's a matter of scale and efficiency.
