The ability to continue to have mail-in voting is extremely important to a wide variety of citizens. Those who are elderly and have difficulty with mobility; those who travel for work and would be out-of-state during the actual election date; those who are traveling for pleasure; those who have difficulty leaving their house; and the vast number of students who are out of state for school; and finally it significantly increases voter participation. Having the ability to vote by the mail-in method does absolutely no harm to other voters; it does not create erroneous votes; nor does it give an advantage to a particular candidate. Continuing to have the ability to have mail-in voting is an absolutely positive method, and those who say otherwise perhaps have another agenda.
