I love my job. I work with the future lawyers, police officers, factory workers etc. Hope is what I get to cultivate for these kids regardless of where they are academically.

However, the target cuts will hurt the possible diversity for our future. I just mentioned the jobs in the first question. These jobs have been around for thousands of years. They maintain society as it is. But they are not the future. Diverse minds like ADHD and disability give problems for the basic school days. But these minds also solve problems in wonderful and never thought of ways. Without funds the school system as it is will not help these future thinkers to grow and solve what the future needs. They will only be ridiculed and pushed aside.

All senators and government officials know. They went through the same system. They know first hand how school was easy for some and not for others. That has not changed for over 150 years. Cutting money will not help change these problems. This will only make the future problem solvers not be available to solve the future disasters and troubles that this earth will give us. We need to have more work at changing the things that are wrong instead of abandoning the system entirely.
