I am submitting testimony in support of Senate Bill 916 to end the exclusion of Unemployment Insurance benefits for workers when they are on strike in Oregon.

I'm a care-worker, so my strike opportunities are limited. I depend upon my union sisters and brothers to march for me. Striking is one of the very few tools labour has to achieve fair treatment and livable wages. Becoming a union member allowed me to buy a home, join the taxable workforce and help half a dozen Oregonians stay in their homes in their final years.

Without the Union, we'd still be making $3 an hour, which was the case 15 years ago. Now we have careers we train and do our best at. Many millions have been saved and lives enriched.

Please let our Union brethren strike for us without fear of losing everything.

Strikes are never the first choice for workers—they are the last resort after exhausting all other options. Often, workers continue showing up under expired contracts for months or even years because they care about their jobs and their communities. But when an employer refuses to bargain in good faith, workers sometimes have no choice but to strike. SB 916 is a commonsense policy that ensures striking workers can still afford necessities like rent, groceries, and healthcare.

Employers already hold significant leverage in these situations, and many use tactics like cutting healthcare benefits to pressure workers back to the table. If employers can take away healthcare, then workers should have the right to access unemployment benefits. UI is not a full paycheck—it is a partial wage replacement that allows workers to survive while they fight for fair contracts.

This policy comes at an extremely low cost to the UI fund and has minimal impact on employers. In the rare cases of public sector strikes, the ability to access UI benefits will make a meaningful difference for workers.

Passing SB 916 will lead to fairer negotiations, shorter strikes, and a more balanced bargaining process. Oregon workers deserve this basic protection.
