Workers do not go on strike because simply because things are just kind of bad at work. Strike is the last resort, nobody wants to have to take that step. No workers should be forced to accept working conditions so bad that they feel they must strike just because they cannot pay the rent or put food on the table while out on strike. The playing field is already stacked against these workers, otherwise they wouldn't have to strike. Allowing businesses with millions upon millions of dollar of assets to starve out striking employees only continues to unjustly weight the scale in the favor of what have proven to be bad employers, because if they were not bad employers, then the workers wouldn't have to go out on strike in the first place. Give working class people the fighting chance they deserve by passing this legislation so that companies will have to fairly negotiate and come to mutually acceptable terms without destroying the lives of the people working for them under a currently unjust situation, hence them having to go out on strike. Strikes are serious and only happen when things have reached a breaking point because of how the workers are treated by the management, do not ever think people go on strike for "fun" or because they are greedy, they only go out on strike when things have been broken and life cannot tolerate the current circumstances any longer.
