Insurance coverage for fertility treatment is important because having children is a basic life goal for many people, not a luxury. From firsthand knowledge , fertility treatments can be extremely expensive, and without insurance, many families are forced to give up even when treatment could work. I've learned that infertility can affect people for medical reasons beyond their control, which makes coverage a fairness issue, not a choice. When insurance helps cover these treatments, it reduces stress and allows people to focus on their health instead of overwhelming costs. Overall, covering fertility treatment supports families, mental well-being, and equal access to healthcare. I was lucky enough to be financially able to go through fertility treatment and I can't imagine not having my son, simply because of the fact I couldn't afford the process.
