The Electoral College is a relic of the early days of the American Experiment, where the small cadre of Founding Fathers feared the masses running riot against sound governance. For all their wisdom, time has shown that the real danger lies in political subterfuge that distorts or erases the manifest will of the people. Until such time as truly direct elections are held, the least we can do is ensure that the Electors play their part with total transparency and accountability to the voters they represent. The American people deserve government they can trust in, and bolstering the integrity of the vote-aggregation process is a fine step towards that goal.
